This visit has been organised by George Freeman

The Apothecaries go back to 1180 and became responsible for the preparation of drugs and potions. They are still part of the examination system for doctors. The Foundling Museum tells the story of Coram's hospital and holds the art works that were donated to it.

The London Apothecaries can be traced back to the Guild of Pepperers in 1180. They were joined by the Spicers who, in 1428, became the Worshipful Company of Grocers. By the 16th century the Apothecaries were specialising in the preparation of drugs and potions whereas the grocers were traders and eventually in 1617 James I gave the Royal Charter to the Worshipful Company of Apothecaries of London. They created the Chelsea Physic Garden as a teaching ground for Apothecaries and today, in conjunction with teaching hospitals, hold some of the examinations for doctors. The hall was rebuilt after the Fire of London in 1672 and is one of the oldest Livery Halls in London. Mr Howe, the Beadle, will tell us about the Company and will show us around the building. After lunch we will go to the Foundling Museum to hear about Coram's work with abandoned children, the first UK children's charity. To increase income, social evenings were held regularly with music and works of art by Hogarth, Mozart and others being donated to the organisation creating the first public art gallery in the 1740s. All this is now in the museum. They also have exhibitions; Georgian plaster work in the summer and Victorian paintings of "fallen women" from external organisations at the time of our visit. We will have tea there and have free time to explore the building and exhibition. WC1N 1AZ
